I want to make a website for video chat to use in school and they have blocked all the good ones that allow you to do it randomly. Why would you reinvent the wheel by creating another webcam chat site? Isn't chat roulette good enough? It's a lot of work for a product that is already very well satisfied, and if your idea is revolutionary, you probably don't make a profit or advertise. There is no easy button to create your own video chat site. If you want your own webcam chat site, you'll want to learn a few languages of web programming such as HTML, JavaScript and XML (or Ajax), PHP and ActionScript (for Flash). You want to buy a domain and set up hosting. It's a lot of work, but you can use your knowledge to program other things as well if webcam chat doesn't work. You can always use a public CHAT API. Red5Chat, Video Chat Builder are some popular open source APIs, searching for more on hot scripts. Explore web programming W3Schools Tizag HTML Dog Buy yourself a few books in these languages and read them. Mess around with simple web programming first, familiarize yourself with web hosting and domain purchases. You can always buy a template and place your app inside it, but I suggest you just create your own. Chatroulette, a controversial webcam-powered chat service that connects users with strangers from around the world, has been temporarily withdrawn with promises of updates. A message on chatroulette's homepage reads: Experiment #1 is over for now. Thanks for participating - A redesigned and updated version of the website will be launched tomorrow, i.e. Monday. Does this mean that a service notorious for genital mutilation is clearing its act? Founded in 2009 by 17-year-old Russian entrepreneur Andrei Ternovsky, Chatroulette quickly gained a reputation for X-rated exhibitionism (and also had privacy issues). The demographics and behavior of the site, RMetrics' web analysis firm, were embarrassing, especially because they were lovingly considered perverts (users who did not wear clothing; showed apparent nudity; or committed lewd acts):The overall rate of perverts in Chatrulett is 13 percent. This means that roughly 1 in 8 chat sessions will have something decidedly rated R (or NC-17) at the other end. Of the perverts identified, only 8 per cent were women. Combined with the overall female rate, this means that less than 1 percent of chats have a female pervert. RMetrics also found that Chatroulette users were 89 percent male and 47 percent Americans, though boasted a low concentration pervert by only 10 percent. Because of this behavior - or the natural breakdown of the internet meme - the traffic of the Chatroulette site has been on the decline. The service was launched in November 2009, and got to 500 users a day. A month later, there were 50,000 users a day. Around March, it grew to 1.5 million users. After that, the movement began to subside, Venturebeat said in a statement. The latest figures show an even deeper drop, from 1.56 million in April to 1.33 million in May.Artwork: Chip TaylorTernovskiy enlisted the help of social media gurus to help find a solution to the site's flashing problem. According to rumors, the features of the change include an algorithm that can scan this video and detect the penis, thereby blocking those users who would like to show their naughty bits over and over again. Other features include tagging users who are constantly skipping Ology.com news. Chatrulett also collaborated with Napster founder Sean Fanning, but recent rumors from TechCrunch suggest that the relationship may have broken down. Fanning's supposed departure may have more to do with his newest startup, Path, which is a tool that facilitates the creation, exchange and correlation of lists, and has nothing to do with Chatrulett's disgrace. What's in the future for Chatrulett? Does a takedown site mean redefining images, perhaps with the addition of anti-perverted software? Or did Chatroulette admit that his fifteen minute glory is now over? Note: When you buy something after clicking links in our articles, we can earn a small commission. ChatRoulette Map does exactly what it sounds like using Google Maps to build the IP addresses of all the voyeurs and weirdos that are on the web and using a crazy site. You can choose whether to raise a picture of yourself so far, FC has noticed a pair of dirty bras, some top-off Latin guys with questionable facial hair, and some poorly written signs leaving you no doubt as to what the user is looking for. The site has already had to set up its M.O., since some of the ChatRouletters have been exposed, and user-identifiable information is being found in their IP details. Most busted, however, may have been users in the Northeast: a message on the website reads: We would advise maine.edu to stop using student names in their names. ChatRoulette Map via Laughing Squid By Andrei Ternovsky, creator of Chat Roulette, just might sit on the hottest internet property since Facebook was founded five years ago. But he's not An American. He's Russian. And that puts him right in the middle of some powerful forces. On the one hand, Russian investors, supported by the Prime Minister himself, force him to stay. But America's freedom and wealth may just pull it back. This tension is outlined in the first profile of Ternovsky, published by the German Der Spiegel. Just check out this amazing scene in which a Russian investor with a net worth of about $680 million and who is Facebook's biggest foreign defender is trying to seduce seduce Milner and Ternovsky talk for an hour and a half. The multi-millionaire would like to go into business with a teenager who has not been to school for a few weeks and is on the verge of exclusion because of his truancy. After all, Ternovsky is now a businessman. Milner wants to buy 10 percent of Chatroulette. He wants Ternovsky to name his price, but the teenager just ventures the entrepreneur together. And the stakes, of course, are international in their scale: ... The total value of Google, Microsoft and Facebook is about $500 billion, or about a third of the annual output in the Russian economy. So if Russia, which has more than 50 million Internet users and boasts one of the fastest growing markets- hopes to catch up, then it will have to keep talents like Ternovsky at home. But Ternovsky did not immediately sign with Milner. He wants to think about Milner's proposal first. How much is his idea really worth? According to some estimates, it costs from 10 to 30 million euros. And should he join forces with a Russian business partner or with an American company? The profile has a few fascinating bits of Ternowski busy trying to keep freaks and bastards off the site. And the paintings are priceless - a freshly-faced secret when he smiles in a bedroom filled with empty bookshelves, or in front of his gloomy Soviet-era apartment complex. But more worryingly for Milner and Russia, he plans to at least visit America to listen to investors. The internet is my world. This connects Moscow with the West, he says. And he always dreamed of owning his own startup in Silicon Valley. There has been a lot of talk that American is on the decline because we no longer attract smart young immigrants. But it shows that Ternovsky's dreams seem to draw him here. While ChatRoulette may seem like a blunt trick for one-handed web surfing perverts, there's no reason it can't become something mainstream. French Connection already uses it for marketing. (Why can't product designers and marketers sit down for a casual interview? Moreover, as our intrepid Dan Maksei suggests, ChatRoulette opens up a whole new world of communication on the Internet. What actually sounds a lot like Facebook, doesn't it? You can imagine all sorts of bunkers, from dating to casual conversations filtered by themes or interests. But Ternowski will need the right business partners to make sure he doesn't suffer from the fate of MySpace instead. (Der Spiegel via ReadWriteWeb) Omegle matches you random strangers for one-on-one text and video chats. At any given time, you will find thousands of people online and ready to chat.
